

HOLMES AS A POET

The Gaiety Doctor is the Only Survivor of the Race.

HIS WORKS WILL BE CLASSIC

So Long as American Literature Exists—His Present Efforts to Prolong a Well Spent Life.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, it is said, is devoting his energies to the avowed purpose of prolonging life. That has become the gaiety doctor's chief ambition. Dr. Holmes does not care to live for the mere satisfaction of existing; but his ever-curious mind has taken a new bent. It believes that by a strict conformation to sanitary and hygienic laws it is possible for a person to prolong life indefinitely. He has long preached that the secret of long life lies in a lifetime is given to a writer to compose a poem of the kind. "The Chambered Nautilus" might have been written by Shelly, Keats or Hogg, but no other English poet could have composed it. Dr. Holmes' earlier and later poems are his best. Those which were written during the hours of his tameness of his middle life display neither the brightness nor the finish of his other work. Strange as it may seem, one of his most brilliant poetic productions was among the last. "The Brown Stick Train," is a masterpiece of a thing as the brain of wit or poet ever conceived. It is not light, and it is not dignified, but it is inexpressibly bright. In it Dr. Holmes seems to have caught the inspiration of the French classic writers, and has woven a common place occurrence into a fantastic tale of Parisian witcraft and Mephistophelean wiles.

Dr. Holmes' prose works can hardly be said to rank with his best poetry. Still there are thousands who love "The Autocrat at the Breakfast Table," and revel in the quaint humor of "The Professor." The former is undoubtedly a masterpiece of its kind. The latter does not sustain the interest of the casual reader so well. "The Poet at the Breakfast Table" lives principally by the reflected popularity from the other two. "Over the Teacups" cannot
